17:00 In this era of division, wealth gaps and filter bubbles leave us further away from understanding one another. To bridge the divide, an increasing number of architects, artists and institutions are adopting a grassroots approach, deeply embedding themselves in the communities that will use or witness their work. What are some of the techniques being used to respond to real needs? Does some of the creative vision need to be sacrificed in the process?

They will lay out their visions for the next decade, imagining how culture can navigate a world in turmoil.

Panel: World-Building: A Peek Inside the Creative Process

Today's most complex immersive artworks are often understood as the manifestation of a single artist's vision. But the finished work is the product of a web of collaborators who bring this vision to life – much like an orchestra, with the artist acting as both conductor and musician. We look inside the creative process of Jakob Kudsk Steenson – who builds entire universes by working closely with scientists, composers, musicians and writers – and two of his closest collaborators. Do their ideas enhance his work, or transform it?

Panel Symposium: Introducing the Bukhara Biennial (room: Salone d'Onore)

Supported by the Uzbekistan Art and Culture Development Foundation

Uzbekistan has long been known as a center of ancient culture along the Silk Road, and is now on the rise as an incubator for contemporary arts. The city of Bukhara was named a UNESCO Creative City of Crafts and Folk Art in 2023, and later this year it will host Central Asia's first major international art gathering, the Bukhara Biennial. In a rare commitment to local talent, all of the works presented at the Biennial will be produced in the country. We speak with the commissioner, this year's curator and one of the participating artists to discuss the curatorial concept for the event, the long-term vision, and Bukhara's architecture as inspiration.

Diana Campbell, Artistic Director, Bukhara Biennial 2025: Recipes for Broken Hearts and Head of Global Initiatives, Hartwig Art Foundation

Antony Gormley, Sculptor

Gayane Umerova, Chairperson, Uzbekistan Art and Culture Development Foundation

Artistic and Experiential Presentation: Coping With Trauma Through the Arts (room: Agora)

What is the healing and transformative potential of play and art-making? How can we use it to help people develop skills for coping with uncertainty, stress, trauma and loss? This presentation will introduce basic art therapy concepts while giving examples from some of Dr. Berger's latest programs. It will also include a short exercise that will teach how to use imagination and visual imagery to connect to inner strength and ease stress.

Panel: Worlds Imagined: Biodiversity and Tech

According to the International Union for Conservation of Nature, more than 46,000 species are threatened with extinction, a colossal 26 percent of all species the organization tracks – that's a 12 percent deterioration in the last 20 years. As alarming as these statistics are, what if we could envision all that's at risk? Some artists are doing just that, using technology to recreate lost worlds or peer into alternative futures where biodiversity thrives.

In a time of major cultural and political upheaval, some see institutions as part of the problem, and others as part of the solution. And how should cultural institutions navigate the shifting priorities of local and national governments?

As nations rethink economic growth and development, creative industries have become strategic assets. From film and fashion to gaming and design, culture-driven economies are fueling innovation, shaping national identities, and redefining global influence. Governments worldwide are aiming to leverage the creative sector to diversify industries, attract investment and foster social progress. But as culture is also increasingly seen as political, can creativity truly become a cornerstone of economic resilience?

Recent elections have seen political power shift decidedly rightward in several countries, not least in the United States – which is home to 40 percent of the art market. Meanwhile the contemporary art world has historically leaned left and explored progressive, or even rebellious themes. How might the political shift play out in the market?

With conflicts raging from Gaza to Ukraine, Sudan to Syria, one might assume that artistic production would be stifled when daily survival is in question. But often the opposite is true, with creativity enduring and even flourishing. How can art help people cope in dark times, and how might it help others understand both horror and resilience in times of war?
